Abstract In my dissertation, I develop a novel version of semicompatibilism. Semicompatibilism is the view that the freedom required for moral responsibility is compatible with causal determinism even if the freedom to do otherwise is not. I modify this general view by providing arguments for three theses: 1) that one's history can affect the degree to which (but not whether) one is morally responsible, 2) that indeterminacy is no gain to the control necessary for responsibility, and 3) that the requirements on responsibility for actions and omissions are symmetrical. These theses, both individually and taken together, provide my account with advantages over extant accounts, and I develop the theses and highlight the advantages they afford in addressing the five main objections to semicompatibilism. Because the view is a compatibilist one, it is targeted by objections to compatibilism itself. I focus on two sets of objections here: the manipulation objection and two objections from luck. I argue that compatibilist views are safe from both sets of objections. I then consider and address two objections that target semicompatibilism in particular. The first challenges the view's distinctiveness, claiming that the dispute between semicompatibilists and traditional compatibilists is merely verbal. The second objection challenges proponents of semicompatibilism to provide an adequate account of moral responsibility for omissions.
